What is COD? COD is a chemical oxygen demand (COD) test used to measure the amount of oxygen required to oxidize organic matter in water. It is a common test used in wastewater treatment plants to monitor the effectiveness of the treatment process. The test is performed by adding a known amount of a strong oxidizing agent (usually potassium dichromate) to a sample of water and measuring the amount of oxygen consumed. The result is expressed as milligrams of oxygen per liter of water (mg/L). COD is a useful indicator of the organic load in water and can be used to estimate the biochemical oxygen demand (BOD) of a sample. BOD is a measure of the amount of oxygen required to oxidize organic matter in water over a specific period of time. COD is a more immediate measure of organic load than BOD, but it is also more expensive to perform. COD is a key parameter in the design and operation of wastewater treatment plants. It is used to determine the capacity of the plant and to monitor the effectiveness of the treatment process. COD is also used to estimate the amount of organic matter that will be converted to carbon dioxide and methane during the anaerobic digestion process. COD is a useful tool for understanding the organic load in water and for managing wastewater treatment plants.
